01 TRUTH TUESDAY

Holiday Plans Work Better Before the Holiday

Waiting until the last minute rarely makes a holiday schedule easier.

Before a long weekend, confirm the parenting schedule, transportation, travel details, activities, and any items children will need. If an existing order or agreement controls the schedule, review it before making assumptions or proposing changes.

Early planning creates time to identify a problem, seek appropriate guidance, and keep children away from avoidable day-of conflict.

02 WEDNESDAY WISDOM

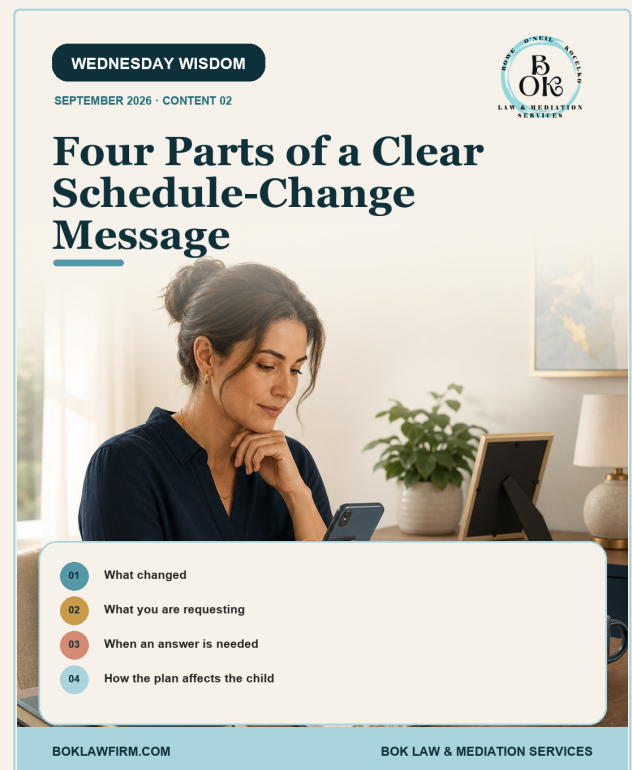

Four Parts of a Clear Schedule-Change Message

Schedule changes are easier to evaluate when the request contains the information that matters.

Explain what changed, state the specific adjustment you are requesting, identify when an answer is needed, and describe any practical effect on transportation, school, activities, or the child. Keep the tone neutral and the message limited to the current decision.

A clear request does not require agreement or override an existing order. It simply creates a better starting point for the conversation.

03 FAMILY FRIDAY

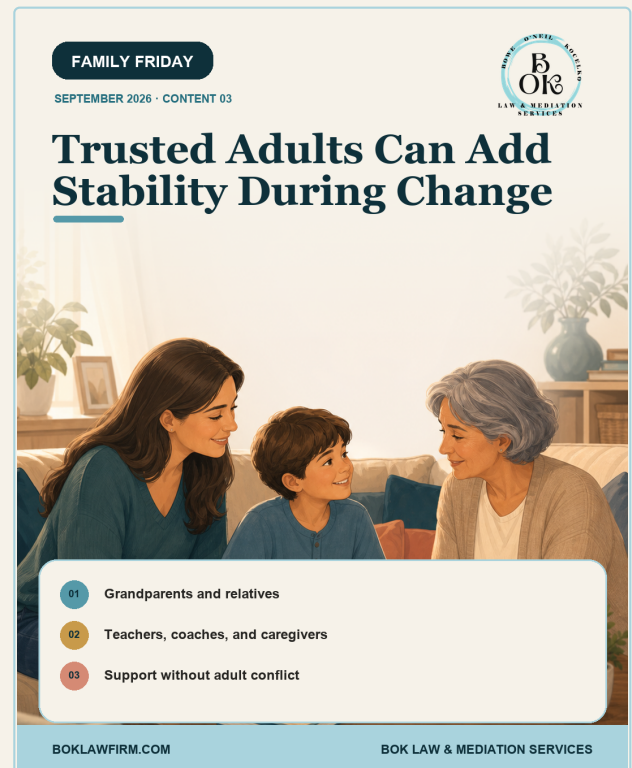

Trusted Adults Can Add Stability During Change

Children often benefit from dependable relationships with trusted adults during periods of family change.

Grandparents, relatives, teachers, coaches, caregivers, and family friends can provide continuity, encouragement, and a familiar place to talk or simply be themselves. The most helpful adults support children without pulling them into adult conflict or asking them to carry messages.

Take a moment to appreciate the people who show up consistently and help children feel connected across changing routines.
