A separation date is more than a detail on a calendar. Under Pennsylvania law, spouses can be considered separate and apart even if they still live in the same home. That date can matter when property is classified and when the divorce process moves forward.

If separation may be happening, write down what changed and when. Preserve account statements, loan balances, tax records, and messages that show the shift in the marital relationship. A clear record can make the first legal conversation far more useful.

Every family is different. BOK Law helps clients understand the facts, the options, and the next practical step. Call 412.941.9410 for a free one hour consultation.

Pennsylvania generally protects mediation communications and documents from disclosure in later proceedings. That privacy gives people room to explore options candidly. It does not erase every rule or every exception.

A signed settlement may be introduced when someone asks a court to enforce it. Existing financial records do not become protected merely because they were brought into mediation. The law also includes limited exceptions involving threats, injury, property damage, and fraud connected to an agreement.

The practical lesson is simple. Prepare carefully, disclose honestly, and understand any document before signing it. Learn more about family mediation at BOKLawFirm.com or call 412.941.9410.

A complete property discussion should include more than the house, cars, and bank accounts. Digital assets can carry real value and can be easy to overlook. Think about cryptocurrency, online payment accounts, rewards balances, domains, online businesses, royalties, and valuable digital files.

Start with an inventory. Record the platform, account owner, approximate balance, acquisition date, and available statements. Preserve records without moving, hiding, or spending assets. Access rights, valuation dates, and tax consequences can require professional guidance.

A careful inventory supports better questions and a more informed settlement conversation. BOK Law offers practical guidance for Pennsylvania families. Call 412.941.9410 for a free one hour consultation.
